Why attend this training day?

Classroom observations should satisfy the needs of the teacher, the organisation, and above all the students of the organisation. These needs will vary from place to place and from time to time so every academic department should have a range of observation procedures, which are understood and agreed by all concerned. In this session we will look at the various reasons for classroom observations, and the different ways of approaching them depending on their purpose.

Learning outcomes

Delegates will be better able to get buy-in from teachers on their observation policies and procedures, and to adapt the approach taken to the case in hand. Whether it is for developmental, appraisal / QC, or performance management purposes, the right kind of classroom observation is a great tool to every academic department.

Who is it for?

Both experienced and inexperienced academic managers, directors of studies, directors and principals.
